Important information about the procedures to open a new account.

In order to help the government to fight the financing of activities linked to terrorism and money laundering, the federal legislation demands that all financial institutions shall obtain, verify and record information allowing to identify each person opening an account.

Said information shall be verified and compared against federal and international agencies such as OFAC, responsible to the Department of the Treasury of the USA.

What does this mean for you?

Upon opening an account, we will ask you to provide your name, address, date of birth, and other information allowing us to identify you. Also, we will ask you to show your driver's license or other identification documents.

Declaration of publication and knowledge of the risk of investment concentration

Please read carefully the information contained in this Declaration of Publication and Knowledge of the Risk of Investment Concentration before deciding on investing 10% or more of your total investment portfolio in a single security, type of asset or industrial sector. We understand that situations and circumstances can arise where you, the investor, could wish to have your account assets concentrated in a limited number of securities, asset classes or industrial sectors.

However, we want to be certain that you know that a balanced and well-diversified portfolio has the potential to provide a lower downside risk than a portfolio concentrated in a limited number of investments.

Although we would suggest you to reduce your account risk by diversifying its assets through shares from other industrial sectors, common investment funds and/or bonds, the decision to do so is totally personal and depends on the financial resources, risk tolerance and objectives of each investor. By signing this document at the bottom, the holders of an account recognize that concentrating their investment portfolio in a limited number of securities could increase a loss risk due to lack of diversification and that they have the financial capacity to assume higher risk levels.

Exchange Risk.

Weakening of a country's currency vis-à-vis the US Dollar or other leading currencies will negatively impact the value in Dollars of an instrument denominated in such currency. The exchange rates are affected by economic, social and political factors, so they can greatly fluctuate, even during the intraday operation. Some countries could impose exchange controls, including currency devaluation or suspension of the possibility of changing or transfer foreign exchange.

Credit Risk.

Issuers and debtors of sovereign and corporate debts could happen to be unable to make timely principal or interest payments due to which a default situation could arise regarding the debt or underlying loan. The extent to which a company or a government can pay a debt affects not only the market corresponding to such particular debt, but also the market of all instruments relating to said company or country. Although the risk level is assessed by credit analysts, intercountry comparison of credit risks could turn out little reliable, for risk classification agencies worldwide use different evaluation criteria.

Liquidity Risk.

As the offer of potential sellers increases or as the demand by potential buyers decreases, or in both situations, the liquidity of an investment will decrease and the margins between purchase and sale prices will be wider. Natural disasters and economic, social and political events arising in a country could generate a liquidity reduction in the investments relating to said country, which makes it difficult to make agile sales and/or subjects seller to substantial price discounts.

Investments in instruments of emerging markets should be made only by sophisticated investors having an independent knowledge of the respective markets, that are capable of considering and weighing the different risks, and that are able to face the risk of substantial capital loss.

In signing this document, account holders recognize that such investments could be more volatile and pose higher risks than other investments available in the market, and they also recognize that they have sufficient financial capacity to face the risks of such investments.

Declaration of publication and knowledge of junk bonds risks, non-investment securities

Please read carefully the information contained in this Declaration of Publication and Knowledge of Risks before investing in bonds deemed Risk Bonds, "Junk Bonds" and/or other non-investment securities. Companies issuing high-yielding bonds ("Junk Bonds") do not have the same financial strength as those having higher credit classifications, so these bonds use to be deemed speculative investments. These companies are more vulnerable to financial crises and recession than solvent companies, which could deteriorate their capacity to pay principal and interests. The fulfillment capacity in the debt service of an issuer could be considerably restricted.

Additionally, the whole "Junk Bond" market can suffer sudden and abrupt price changes due to a series of factors such as changes in economic previsions, activity of the security market, constant large sales in the hands of important investors, cessation of payments or a change in the market psychology.

In signing this document, account holders recognize that said investments involve a payment cessation associated risk intrinsically high and that, as investors, they have the financial capacity to face said higher risks.

Declaration of publication and knowledge of the risks of emerging markets and Latin American fixed income instruments

Please read carefully the information contained in this Declaration of Publication and Knowledge of Risks before making an investment in a debt instrument of an emerging market and/or a Latin American fixed income instrument. The risks of investing in instruments relating to emerging countries or markets and/or established in South America or Central America are higher because, among other things, of the sovereign, economic, and exchange risks, fall of the credit quality, liquidity risk, political uncertainty and differences in accounting policies. Additionally, many emerging markets lack clear and fully developed legal, judicial and regulatory infrastructures with respect to liquidation of transactions. The nature and magnitude of the risks vary according to the country, the investment instrument and the time when the transaction is carried out. The use of a leverage, in turn, could increase the risk. Below we explain and describe some, although not all of the risks that could affect your investment portfolio.

Political Risk.

Many Latin American countries and emerging markets are going through, or have experienced along the last years, significant political changes that have impacted their governing policies, including changes in the regulation of their industries, trade, financial markets, and domestic and foreign investments. The relative instability of these political systems makes these countries more vulnerable to economic difficulties, to public order or popular discontent regarding reforms, political or diplomatic changes, social instability or change of governmental policies. These circumstances could imply reversion of some or all of the political reforms, repercussions unfavorable to foreign investment or rejection and deviation of the market economy. For investors, the results could involve confiscatory taxation, exchange controls, compulsory acquisitions, nationalizations or expropriation of foreign assets without compensation, or the restructuring of certain industrial sectors in a way that could adversely affect investments made in the same. All disturbances or changes perceived, whether real or expected, in the governmental policies of a country, be it due to elections or any other circumstance, could negatively affect the value of investments linked to these countries.

Sovereign Risk.

Strikes, imposition of exchange controls or war declarations could hamper or impede the devolution of funds to another given country. The interest rate of an instrument could reflect or not the perceived sovereign risk.

Economic Risk.

The economies of these countries could be more vulnerable to increasing interests rates and inflation. Investments could be negatively impacted by low economic growth rates, corporate profits, national and international fund flows, external and sovereign debt, dependence on international trade and sensitivity to the worldwide prices of commodities.

Likewise, a change in the tax regime could bring along a sudden imposition of arbitrary or additional taxes.
